Opening narration:

They say that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, that to imitate someone is to pay that person a genuine compliment. Controversial best-selling Horror author Abraham Cork took that adage one daemoniac step further, peppering his latest successful novel with suspiciously familiar language filled with macabre and hideous imagery, a tome of terrifying excesses and stygian madness. His book review has now come due ...in the Twilight Zone.

Closing narration:

Thou shalt not steal, a commandment taunted by three of the seven deadly sins, irresistible enticements for one Abraham Cork, who learned the hard way that accepting undue accolades for another scribe's eldritch work is akin to robbing their very soul. An accursed crime punishable by the vilest, and most loathsome tortures and torments born of his own blasphemous writings ... in The Twilight Zone.
