Opening narration:

Mr. Harold Silverstone, a wealthy, bed ridden, penny-pinching misanthropic octogenarian on his final hours of life. Mr. Harold Silverstone has just been granted a wish, a desperate plea if you will, for just one more day.

A day without pain.

A day without doctors or hospital beds.

A wish that could only be granted by a higher power and could only take place in a location where anything can happen and usually does.

This is the Twilight Zone.

Closing narration:

It's often said irregardless of status, rich or poor, black or white, man or woman, whatever the case may be, on our deathbeds, none of us wish for more things. If anything, we wish for more time.

Mr Silverstone realized this one simple fact, albeit almost too late. That fact being

.....

That the best things in life truly aren't things—tonight's tale of faith, hope and charity in the Twilight Zone.
