

“The Prison Cell”

by Holly Brown, copyright 2017

Opening narration:

Submitted for your approval: one isolated woman in the modern day, trapped by the spiderweb of technology. The place could be main street, anywhere USA. This woman is searching for her purpose, her sense of fulfillment through the façade that modern technology offers. She has searched for meaning through this search engine, but soon her search for meaning will turn into a battle for her very sanity in a place in the near distance called the Twilight Zone.

Closing narration:

This young woman’s quest for meaning in the isolated world of technology has broken her down to this paranoid shell that we see before us. She is stuck in this prison of her own making, her lone companion the glowing screen of her cell phone sitting in front of her. She is void of any true connection. Her last search inquiry: how to belong.
