Opening Narration

Sky colored red, air filled with dread and a town scared to death. The aforementioned are not the elements of a nightmare or a natural disaster, but of a recipe. A recipe to a village sick to its stomach with prejudice, hate and disdain. Such type of ailments can only be treated by a very powerful dose of retribution, and that particular kind of prescription happens to be the specialty of...the Twilight Zone.

Closing Narration

And so the sky clears, having injected all the pain and misery onto the veins of the town that allowed it to fester. Nevertheless, our patient breathes a sigh of relief, having survived the worst illness man could ever conceive. The question that remains is whether he will take this experience as a sign to change his habits or merely as an inconvenience. Unfortunately, the answer to that query lies outside...the Twilight Zone.
