Opening Narration

Witness Deborah Russo, age 74, recovering from a common injury for those her age. But it's what's happening to her mind that's more debilitating than any bruises or broken bones life can throw at her. For Mrs. Russo is dealing with one of mankind's greatest fears—the loss of her memory. And for the briefest of moments, in an impersonal hospital room, you'll get to sit alongside Mrs. Russo on her perilous journey into the Twilight Zone.

Closing Narration

The loss of one's memory is an affliction that robs us of the very experiences that make us who we are. But for some of us, like Mrs. Russo, we'd be better off living in our diminishing minds of forgetfulness, dementia, and delusion—if that's where we're most happy—than to live in the real world filled with the constant reminders of everything we've lost. A harsh truth, courtesy of the Twilight Zone.
