Opening Narration

Incident on a summer night. A young woman wakes to find her fiancée completely vanished from their Idaho cabin. But there has been no disturbance, no sign of exit by the young man. His shoes and jacket are exactly where he left them hours earlier.

For Janice Harwood, this scare is the beginning of a long nightmare...one which will have her questioning her sanity, one which will take her right into the deep forests of the Twilight Zone.

Closing Narration

With horror, Janice Harwood realizes what she has done. This is a horror which will never leave her: the memory of that slumped figure—her boyfriend’s clothes around it—dissolving into smoke and ash.

Word to the wise: let a dreamer dream. Let him wander the precincts of his imagination without disruption. Or you might just land yourself in a nightmare more commonly found in the Twilight Zone.
