“Bump in the Night”

Opening Narration

The man at the door with the bitter scowl on his face is Mr. Douglas Cain, for whom Halloween is no festive night of costumes and candy, but a stinging reminder of laughter that’s been silenced, and dreams ripped away. You may wonder what haunts Mr. Cain on the last, chill night of every October. In a moment, you’ll see it—as will he, because the next knock on his door will bring him onto his porch, and into the very heart of the Twilight Zone.

Closing Narration

There’s an old Scottish prayer for deliverance from “things that go bump in the night.” But as Douglas Cain has discovered, a bump in the night can sometimes be the sound of redemption. He’s been delivered from the specters of guilt and regret, and from a monstrous self-loathing of his own making. Tonight’s tale of fear and freedom, in the Twilight Zone.
