Opening Narration

The picture: dawn over a field where a score of workers tend the wheat—golden strands that, for reasons unknown, refuse to stop their climb toward the heavens. The man before them is their overseer, Charles Munden, who controls his crop of harvesters with a potent disdain. But he’s about to learn that the summit of the flora reaches higher than he can imagine…up into the candid justice of The Twilight Zone.

Closing Narration

Witness the stillness in the chilly morning air. Now look to the wheat that has halted its climb, and to the men who pull it together with no mouth of cold command preying on them. You see, this is a special crop, one that sustains not on sun and water but the unweathered planting of humankind’s cruelty. Feeding on a man’s hopes, his dignity, his dreams, is a fool’s harvest. A tale of straw and man…in The Twilight Zone.
